Alannah Burdess on Akala's 'Natives'
“What struck me the most was how Akala was bullied by his primary school teacher for being too smart. Reading what happened to him made me incredibly angry - no child should be discouraged from achieving their best because of racist attitudes. It is difficult to put into words how important this book is and how it discusses so many elements of how and why this country continues to have issues with systemic racism.”

Conrad Kunadu on David Olusoga's 'Black and British: A Forgotten History'
"Black British history is just British history. In doing away with the 'Windrush Myth' that the history of black people in the UK began in 1948 but much earlier, David Olusoga not only weaves together a fascinating tale, but one that reminds us how truly united we've always been, and how truly malicious attempts to marginalise black history truly are."

Conor Maher on Afua Hirsch's 'Brit(ish)'
"This book, which I am currently reading, is about the struggles of finding an identity as a mixed race person living in England. This book resonates with me as I find many things relatable, such as not quite feeling at home or lacking an identity, which often go unnoticed by non-POC. This shouldn't be normalised and it is important that people realise this."
